Riggs Ward's Latest Project Opens in North Carolina

Richmond, VA – Raven Rock State Park in Lillington, North Carolina (just south of Raleigh) recently opened its new Visitors Center, a LEED-certified building featuring exhibits designed by Riggs Ward Design (RWD). The exhibition focus on the natural plant and animal communities found in the Park, while telling the story of the fall zone and the heritage of the residents who lived and worked in the area.

RWD's design elements include a huge replica of the Raven Rock, a massive geological formation located along the Cape Fear River. This model is a major highlight of the space and is particularly beneficial to those visitors who are unable to make the trek through the Park to see the original. RWD also included computer and hands-on interactives that serve to teach both children and adults valuable lessons about the region's flora, fauna, and history.

Raven Rock State Park is the second visitor's center completed by Riggs Ward for the State of North Carolina in the past two years. Riggs Ward Principal Brent Ward announced, "Everyone at RWD is so excited about designing green exhibits for a LEED-certified building. We appreciate the Raven Rock team's hard work and the great relationship that we have developed with everyone at North Carolina State Parks."

Since its formation over 13 years ago, Riggs Ward Design has offered multidisciplinary design services to a wide variety of clients. From its work with small, local museums and corporations to large government agencies, RWD has established a national reputation for excellence in design and customer service. RWD's unique range of services, combined with its staff of established and well-respected professionals, offers businesses, educational associations, and cultural institutions a single source for all of their creative and content needs.
